

Abstract of the Disclosure

A segmented sill pan has end members and a center section. The end members each have at least one sloped surface, termed a channel, for collecting seepage from a door or window sill. A frontal flange on each end member defines an upright channel for discharge of the seepage away from structural components of a building.